friendships among businessmen in Chicago, rekindling the small-town camaraderie they had enjoyed during their boyhood. The fact that Harris was an attorney, Loehr, a mining engineer, Schiele, a coal dealer, and Shorey, a merchant tailor reflected the men's desire to also build a network that would benefit their businesses. This goal was soon to be overshadowed by the concept of providing service, but the representation of diverse occupations in the club set the stage for Rotary's hallmark classification principle.

The second club meeting took place two weeks later in Harris' office with Harry Ruggles, often referred to as "the fifth Rotarian," in attendance along with real estate dealer William Jensen and Albert White, a piano manufacturer. Ruggles, a

A Look At Rotary's Founding Members

Paul Harris may be the best known of Rotary's four founding members, but without Silvester Schiele, Gus Loehr and Hiram Shorey, the Rotary Club of Chicago would never have come into existence. It was these four men who met at Loehr's office in Room 711 of the Unity building of February 23, 1905 to conduct what has come to be known as the first Rotary club meeting. At the time, however, their purpose was not to printer, is credited with starting the practice of singing at club meetings.

Contrary to popular assumption, Harris was not the first president of the club. That honor went to Schiele, who was elected at the third meeting – held in his office. It was then that the fledgling group named itself Rotary based on the three-time practice of rotating meeting sites. Gus Loehr is believed to have left Rotary after this meeting, and not long after Hiram Shorey also relinquished his membership, though not his life-long regard for the movement he helped to found.

Schiele and Harris remained loyal Rotarians and close friends until their deaths, even living next door to each other.
